2016 campaign about to begin, voters are getting their first look at the differences in candidates' approaches to governing. Most of what they see is not new. What has been striking are the choices between policy prescriptions offered by the major party contenders for the presidency: Donald Trump and Hillary Clinton. The differences between them are rarely subtle. They are rooted in the competing visions for the country that the two candidates have laid out. If you want a detailed accounting of the differences in their plans for dealing with the challenges we face as a nation, then there is no shortage of sources. As John Judis, who studies the presidency for the National Journal, says, "Among many other things, this campaign, in addition to throwing the Democratic Party into a lather, has infused American politics with a new sense of seriousness and earnestness." So, with that in mind, we thought we'd offer a cheat sheet of the positions taken by the two major candidates. It is by no means a definitive statement of the major differences between the two campaigns, but a more-detailed-than-usual examination of what they want to do. We'll consider policy areas such as the economy and military, but will devote particular attention to those where they differ most sharply: health care and national security. Economy Donald Trump
