Motion capture was always an important part of the development process at EA Sports, and we've been working on various pieces of code and technology to "bring the game to life." The breakthrough came when we decided to expand the scope of the implementation to reach the full range of hyperrealism within the match, rather than just expanding on the game ballistics. We started by looking at different leagues and comparing the way they produce and reproduce ball motion. We then looked at the most surprising things in the game—the exaggerated motions of players who have the ball, the tricks players do and the unique movements of individual players—and we asked ourselves, "What if we could do that in game?" We started off exploring different technologies and gained immense experience in using the system. But the ultimate test was the final game. We needed to be able to capture the look and feel of every action that players made on the ball, and we needed to be able to do that in any situation and any number of players. It's that challenge that pushed us to the core of what our development team can do at EA and what we've been working toward. We then moved on to powering the ball. This is the most important part of FIFA. A player with the ball is dangerous to the defense—but the ball also allows a team to create opportunities. So a player with the ball is also a player with the best possible control of the ball. We've spent a lot of time optimizing controls and physics, and we've introduced new player controls that won't be found in any other sports game. These include improved turn, shift and dribbling controls, and we've also worked on the motions of the ball, improving its rotation, velocity, trajectory, and the forces that affect it. Then there's the player physics and behaviors. We developed them with professional football players in mind—and we're so proud of how they play, move and feel when you hold the controller. We've completely rebuilt our player collision system, to ensure that the ball never hits the player and that all players feel solid and dense. There are all sorts of new stopping and sliding mechanics, and, even though it's a small thing, we've included the ability to properly dribble in a specific direction and with varying amounts of force. Players, in fact, have multiple dribbling methods and can even

FIFA was born in the 1970's, when football fanatic Karl-Heinz Rummenigge decided to create an add-on for his computer system, on which the family of his friend worked. In the period of 1976 to 1979, this program came to be the first football game to be released, and on the German market the first football game was released in Germany. In fact, the first computer game that simulated real world football events and was also released in the same market. That was the birth of "FIFA" (Football International Federation Association), a first game that made great steps to revolutionize the football simulation. Since then, many game were made on this game engine, obtaining great success. The Football Association's objectives were to make game more realistic and the players more playable. In 2002, the first FIFA in the new Engine was released, FIFA 2002 with the final KONAMI was released. With a new engine, new gameplay, and new features, the game won very positive reviews and has become the first football simulation for the market of the USA. FIFA 2003. Further developments were made to the FIFA engine, until the release in 2004 of the FIFA Football 2004. With a new engine, even more realistic gameplay and many innovations in the Player Animation, FIFA Football 2004 would be very successful and gain the market in the world and the most players. It was taken by its successor to reach the world. Until now, the engine is known as the FIFA engine. FIFA is a football management game with 3D graphics and in-game commentary. It is about managing a team of real world players in a football league that appears in the game with in-depth attributes such as the scouting of new players, the management of the team through the training of the players, the creation of formations, the strategy of attacking and defending. FIFA is also a simulation of real football events, such as the creation of a strategy of attacks and defense, the analysis of the team, the analysis of individual players, the participation of the players in training and awards for the performance of players and clubs. In this game there are more than 300 clubs, from all over the world, and over 200 types of players (each with its individual characteristics). In addition to the single player mode and the multi player mode, you can also play against your friends using the internet. This makes FIFA a very versatile game, something that is highlighted by the fact that bc9d6d6daa
