I have timestamps, that are stored as MSCurrency. Mongoid converts currency (and everything else, that is not a number) to MSCurrency. I would like to convert the MSCurrency timestamps to a timestamps with mongodb. So far I can't find a way to do this, neither with a direct conversion nor with the gem time_at. UPDATE I was able to fix this problem and deployed the app to production. I just added a rake task that does this conversion. See A: I found a solution for this, as I said, there was no direct conversion, but I converted the timestamps to int and then back to MSCurrency. Conclusion of my approach. Time At won't be able to convert this directly. I suppose it's planned that way. If someone is having the same problem, he can use this approach, or he can do it manually.

After the conversion, you can do the reverse approach to convert it back to MSCurrency. Example: timestamps = MSCurrency.new MSCurrency.new(self.timestamps) self.timestamps = timestamps.to_int When converted back to MSCurrency, use to_msc currency: In my case, I can use this to_msc:

What's new in Tiger Striker MP015:

Frenzy Here it is, the long-rumoured, "Tiger Striker" name for the MP915. The MP915 has been suspected to get a lot of the MP14 form factor, including the stock style switches, though that remains to be confirmed. The "Frenzy" version is completely different, sporting the redesigned stock and chiclet style switches. The Frenzy is bulkier than the "Doom" (without using a black stock); it's about 3mm thicker and also a full 3mm wider. That is, two 3mm taller in width and one 3mm longer in length. As such, it can easily stand side-by-side with all current stock mains now you have it. I also tested with "plastic" mains and those weren't an issue, so you can actually mess with your stock if you wanted. The stock is also a bit shorter than the out of the box stock of the MP14; fear not, this will be the "blue" color. I'm really appreciating the stock in it, but it also works a bit better for my type of gameplay. One other important note is that you can wire the 7242 back to the 3V instead of the barrel jack, allowing for a thinner DIP switch option. I didn't test this on the main switch, but I have this wired up to the 7243 on the 7243 switch. If you're doing that, you don't need the new 7139 red toggle switch, as you can use that. I also noticed you disabled the backlight; while there's some room for improvement here, the game is already playable without the front LED in the Fury. With that LED, the game is basically unplayable. You can sort of squint up while on PC, but it's not very useful. I can see the use of a backlight for a controller on games where the gameplay is indoors, but for PC gamers, the 3D front lighting is actually very helpful. Pictures: Left to Right (Ascaris): Annoying MP14 for size comparison. Left to Right (Fur): New Frenzy, the same as the old Rival Fury, just bulkier. Here are some pictures of some front panels from some other vendors. I will likely open up a thread for purchasers to comment with their own photos, so it's not just me. Heathen At
